A: It should be the old netcat-openbsd ver. 4.0.9. It was released more than 10 years ago and its last release was about 5 years ago. So you'll get a lot of unnecessarily old and obsolete software with that version. And if you are going to use it, don't create your server on an old version of that software. You'll pay with downtimes because of the old release. But there is something on the old version that might be useful for you: It has the capability to download a dump from the network card. You can use it in your local netcat (if no network is available) or in a LAN (if you're on the same subnet with the dump) Basically you have to do like this: Your PC sends a request for the dump with the "open" method, and the server will then read it and create a dump for you. The dump is binarize and printed with the "wb" method. Some hints here: Openbsd netcat knows the open method but not the read/write methods. (The open method is -w and the read and write methods are -r and -p) The file that is written in the binary dump is called netcat.dump It uses the endian-ness of the host. If you have an Intel-based PC, you'll have to write the dump in little-endian mode. If you have a Motorola-based PC, the dump will be written in big-endian mode. And of course you'll have to have a server that's configured to accept dumps like that. Alternatively (If you use a router as server) You could use the mDNS service that most routers have: Dump (or any other name) is sent to the router's IP-address in this format: ip-dump. The router dumps the received dump and waits for the dump to be opened by the client. This wouldn't require a specific application on the client-side and the server-side since a network configuration is enough. (I didn't use the exact format, but i hope you get the idea) Q: how to make this complex query in mysql with stored procedure I have below table structure: Table name: directory id | parent_

The invention relates especially to the weaving of a fabric having a large number of concentric layers of weaving yarn, and has particular application to the weaving of carpets. There are many circumstances in which it is necessary or desirable to employ a fabric having a large number of layers of weaving yarn. In the production of a carpet, for example, it may be required to apply warp yarns in different directions, such as at right angles to one another. It may also be necessary to divide the warp yarns into two or more parts and then to apply such parts to separate layers in a fabric, for example when many layers are required to enable a carpet to be more easily beaten up into its final shape. These and similar requirements may be met by a variety of different methods. One such method is to arrange a number of warp yarns along the selvedge of a woven fabric or along the selvedge of a succession of woven fabrics. After this, the selvedge is cut at intervals. When a second set of yarns is then woven into the fabric, the yarns are woven over a number of the cut ends of yarns. In this way, a fabric having a large number of yarn layers is produced.
